Technical Daily - March 17, 2020

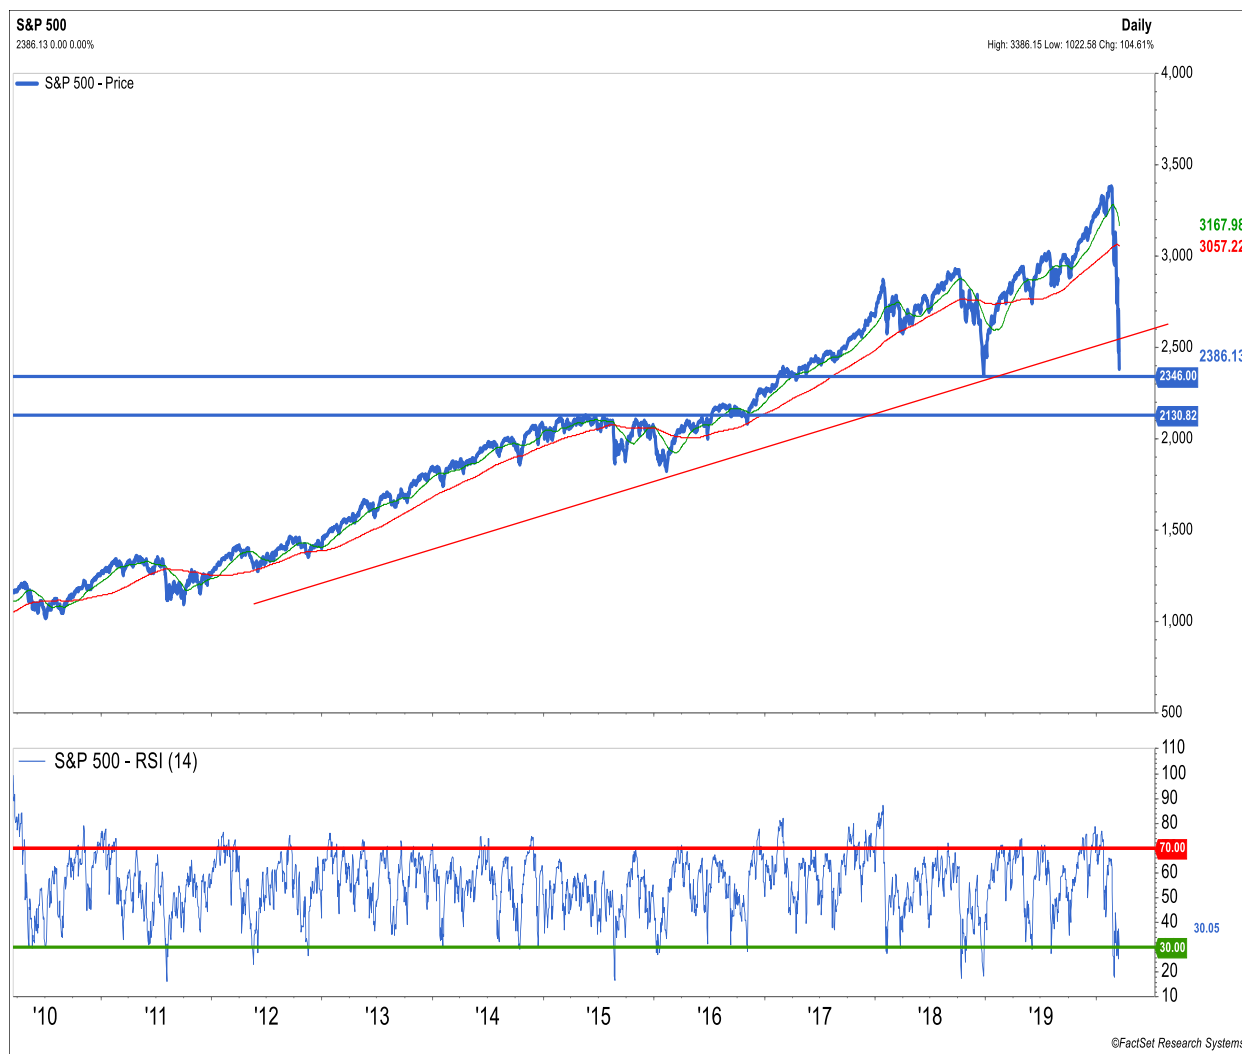

S&P 500

The S&P 500 posted its 3rd worst day in history yesterday closing down almost 12%. The VIX (volatility index) posted its highest close ever at 82.69, surpassing the level set in 2008 when Congress postponed a vote to save the auto industry. The market sank to lows yesterday following the President's comments the outbreak could last until July or August.

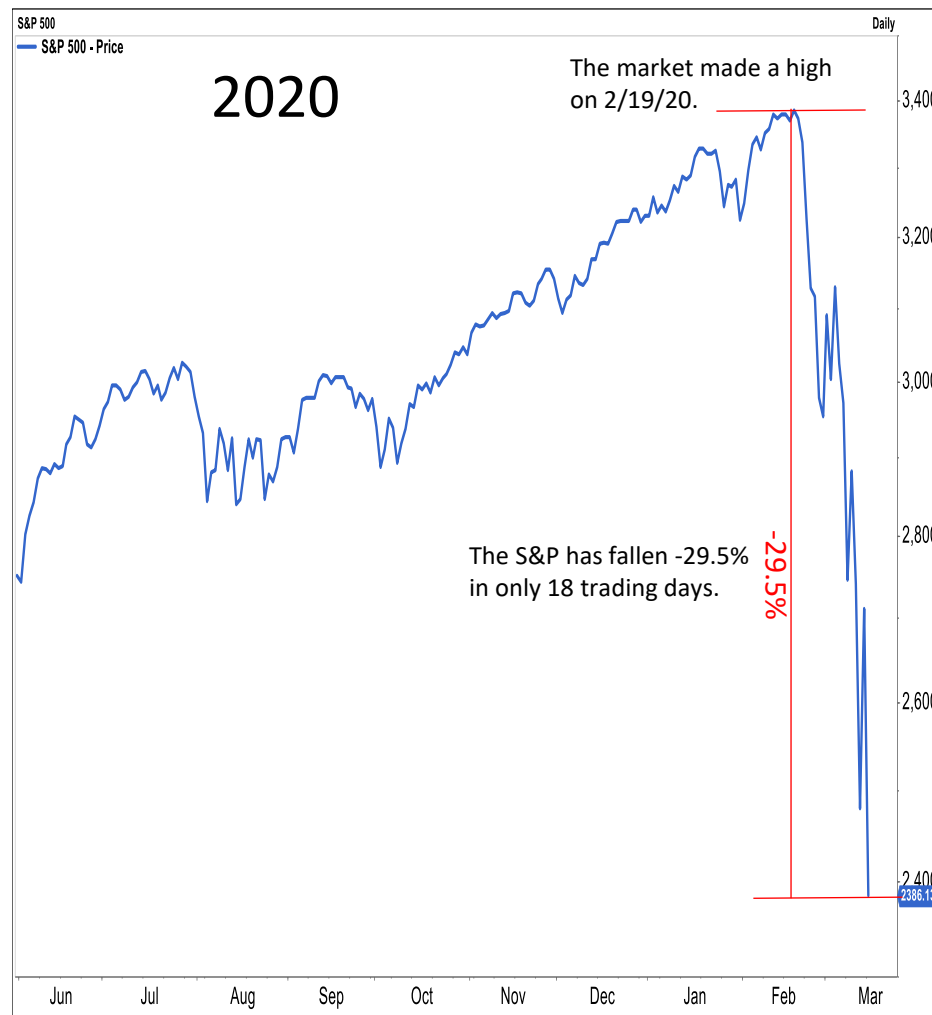

The market is now 30% off highs in a matter of a few weeks and uncertainty is at a peak. We know as test kits become more readily available, the number of cases will increase dramatically. Until we get a sense of how widespread the virus is, and the length of time it will take to get it under control, the markets will likely remain under pressure with wild swings in both directions.

The S&P broke through its trendline yesterday, but there is support from 2018 lows at 2346. Additionally, there is strong horizontal support around 2130.
